

FASKEN

If I Only Knew

Andrew Burt - University of Calgary, 2015 Call

“As much as you can, have fun with the process. If you are relaxed, your natural personality will shine through and you will be more engaging. Be prepared to share interesting and unique stories about yourself and your experiences. Whether it is a sport you play, something you have accomplished, or a trip you have taken, these stories help you connect with people on a different level.”

Perry Feldman - - University of Calgary, 2012 Call

“More than any other factor, mentorship can make the biggest difference as you learn and grow as a young lawyer – we all need some guidance every now and then. So while there might be a lot of great firms with a lot of great lawyers, if you want a great job then you will need to find a mentor. This might be one or two people that you meet through the recruitment process that are going to invest in you as a teammate. If you find those people, and invest in them as well, your career will be off to a great start.”

Sarah Gingrich - Dalhousie University, 2005 Call

“You never know what aspect of your resumé your interviewer will focus on so be yourself - in your application and during the interview. Go through your resumé and cover letter and determine how your experiences relate to the practice of law. Be prepared to tell a “story” about those experiences to let your interviewers know that you have considered such. Many firms interview conversationally. Don’t be thrown off by this.”

FASKEN

Claire Himsl - University of Calgary, 2016 Call

“Fit’ is often touted as the defining quality of a successful candidate and while this term might seem infuriatingly vague right now, it is important to do some introspection and decide what kind of environment you want to work in. Fit is as much about you as it is about the firms doing the hiring. Think about what you value – as a person and as an up-and-coming-lawyer – and find a firm that fits that criteria, whether it’s the desire to have great mentors, to be involved in big deals with big clients, or to work with people who you consider your friends.”

Brenden Hunter - University of Victoria, 2007 Call

“When I was going through the process, I didn’t appreciate how quickly the interview week would progress. Instead of trying to interview everywhere, it’s easier to prioritize your efforts and focus on the firms you are most interested in. You can’t really do this without first doing some homework before interview week. Regardless of where your law school is situated, it’s important to find opportunities to get to know at least some of the lawyers at the firms (e.g., career day, speaking events, speaking to current students, etc.). For both the student and the firm, this makes a positive difference over the longer term. At the end of articles, I have seen more students select their practice areas based on people that they’d like to work with versus areas of law that they thought they would like to practice in. I wouldn’t have expected the ratio to be so lopsided.”

Matthew Wilkins - University of British Columbia, 2018 Call

“If you want to work at a particular firm make it clear that you’re interested. Firms want to hire candidates with strong skills, but they also want to offer positions to people that are enthusiastic about working with them in the future. If members of a firm know that you are serious about joining them, you will be more likely to be considered. Also, pay attention to the interests section of your resumé. Although your grades and other qualifications are important, this is an opportunity to give interviewers an idea of who you are before you meet. A strong interests section piques the curiosity of your interviewers and can help build a rapport with members of the firm.”